“ Alvin man, what's up. It's AJ. Or Alec. I was just thinking about the last time we spent time together. When we took that trip to get that blue caddy. U was doing so well then man. I miss u, I looked at you like a little brother. I hope your resting well.

“ The day you left, it felt like the world lost its color. The skies seemed dimmer, the air heavier, and the beauty of life turned to ash. But in the quiet moments, as the pain settled deep in my chest, I realized something: your love left traces everywhere.

Grief isn't just the absence of you—it's the overwhelming presence of everything you were. Every laugh we shared, every embrace, every moment we thought would last forever—it all echoes now, not in the noise of the world, but in the stillness of my heart.

Though the colors feel faded, I see you in the small things: a butterfly that dances in the sunlight, the way the wind brushes past my cheek, and the warmth of a fading sunset. It's like you're reminding me that you're still here, just in a different way.

Grief is love transformed, and I carry it with me every single day. You may be gone, but your light will always linger in the shadows, painting the world in hues only my heart can see.

You will never be forgotten. You're still the colors of my life, even if they shine differently now.

“ My hearts just shatter for your family man. It's been years since I seen you but I'll never forget the smiles you brought or the one on your face. I know for sure the lives that you entered were lives you had touched forever. RIP

“ A you always impressed me when you would show up to check on me at precisely the right time. I wish I could have been there for you in that way. I'll never forget when I was released from the hospital and you came by I was too sick to stay awake however, you said “girl, relax, I will still be right here when you wake up”! And you were sleeping in the game chair next to my bed. You're loved and missed already.

“ I remember coming back from my grandmother's apartment. I remember there was times. I was having a bad day. Alvin would stop and talk to me. I would ask him how his brother was doing. And every once in a while I would talk to his mother. Most times this will cheer me up. And you would put a smile on my face. Rest in peace brother will be a beautiful day when I see you in heaven.
